

The Best of British

Despite the 400-year age gap, Harrow Bangkok has much in common with its affiliated school Harrow on the Hill—and it's not just the boaters and blazers. Julia Harrison finds out why parents are investing their children's future in the finest British-style education little over the centuries, Harrow Bangkok is nearing completion of an extensive campus redesign which includes new and redeveloped facilities, such as a new creative and performing arts centre, sixth form and early years centre.

There are many opportunities for students to link up with Harrow UK, such as student exchange trips. The headmaster of Harrow UK also visits Harrow Bangkok to deliver talks to parents, which further strengthen bonds between the two schools.

A glance at the university destinations of Harrow UK and Harrow Bangkok alumni show that they both produce students that go onto the very best institutions. In fact, in the lecture theatres in the most selective universities across the world, Harrovians from Bangkok and the UK will be learning together as we speak.

A visitor to Harrow on the Hill, near London in the UK, would have no doubt that they are in one of Britain's most established institutions. At every turn, you are greeted by beautiful architecture and history dating back over 400 years, as students in their blazers and straw hats rush through ancient buildings to their lessons. Founded in 1572, Harrow is known as being the best of the best in terms of independent schools. Distinguished old Harrovians include 23 princes of the Royal Household of Thailand.

But your child doesn't have to board a plane bound for the UK to receive this standard of education. Harrow Bangkok has very close links with its affiliated school, Harrow UK, that go well beyond the famous school uniform, and both schools provide an enriching and academically rigorous experience.

Harrow Bangkok is currently celebrating the best examination results in its history, as well as the opening of a new boarding village that has the best facilities in the ASEAN region. Its new sport academies are going from strength to strength, and its unique Leadership in Action programme has over 90 activities that students can pursue to help develop their leadership attributes.

The one notable point of difference is the campus. While Harrow on the Hill has changed
